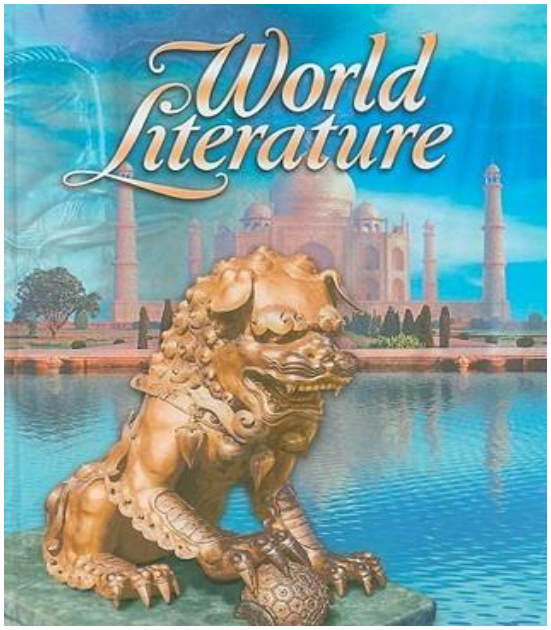
World Literature



World literature comes in two alternate, conceivable versions:

1. Contemporary world literature is the literature of contemporary societies — particularly works of literature that obtain an international reputation.
2. Global classicism might be described as contemporary literature inspired by the multiple traditions of the premodern regional literate civilizations of Eurasia, including the Chinese, Indian, Greco-Roman, Euro-Christian, and Muslim."

The term "world literature" was first used by the German writer and statesman Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, referring to the dissemination of literature from and to countries across the globe. Goethe famously stated in letters to Johann Eckermann in 1827, "National literature is now a rather unmeaning term; the epoch of world literature is at hand, and everyone must strive to hasten its approach." World Literature, in the modern sense, refers to literary works that are translated into multiple languages and circulated to an audience outside their country of origin.

World literature is not a new concept, but as new media technologies explode, so do new ways of disseminating books across national boundaries. And as new ways emerge of delivering world literature to readers worldwide, many scholars are examining the implications of translations on literature, the impact that literature has on culture, and the ways that cultures can transform books. World literature can be an amazing tool for analyzing globalization because it provides a wonderful example of the ways that information is shared across languages and cultures.

The study of world literature is a powerful tool for global studies because it encompasses so many themes that are important to understanding globalization. World literature can shows how information is shared between cultures and nations. It provides insight into how cultural artifacts are transformed as they traverse languages and boundaries. It also can help in understanding the ways that new media technologies could be facilitating globalization by creating a public space for the transmission of literature and other information across the globe.
